THE DRAWINGS OF

Stephen Csoka

THE ARTIST REPRESENTED ON OUR COVER by the spirited pastel of polo ponies and riders is also the author of the drawing reproduced on this, and the next pages. The quality that recommends the draughtsmanship of Stephen Csoka to us and which we, in turn, enthusiastically endorse to our readers, is the living character of its line. Were it not for this pulsating note that imparts personality and authority to these drawings, the subjects themselves would be prosaic — even commonplace. But because each one does have that unmistakable mark of creative flavor, we may consider them individually, as did the artist himself.

Before proceeding with a critique, a few notes about the artist and his background are essential to a better understanding of his direction. Stephen Csoka was born in Gardony, Hungary, in 1897. He studied at the Royal Academy in Budapest from 1922 to 1927, emigrated to the United States in 1934, and became a citizen in 1941. Before coming here, Csoka won several important prizes and medals in Hungary, Spain, and Italy. However, he writes of his first years in the United States with unusual candor: "(They) were very discouraging. Not speaking English was quite a handicap and when I took some of my work to the larger galleries, most of them did not take the trouble to look at it, saying they did not represent foreign artists. After doing hard physical labor during the day to insure our living, I painted and drew at night. At last good fortune brought me to Miss Emily Francis, director of the Contemporary Arts Gallery, who, on viewing my work, promised to give me a one-man show. . . . This took place in 1940 and was followed by three subsequent shows, the latest in the fall of 1956."

Following his first show, things began to improve for Csoka. He was able, through sales of his work, to devote more of his time to his art. As an etcher, his prints were awarded a number of prizes down to 1945, the year in which he won his first important award as a painter — since coming to the United States — in the La Tausca Pearls Competition. Two years later, Stephen won a thousand-dollar purchase prize in the national exhibition conducted by Associated American Artists, which was followed in 1948 by a grant of equal amount awarded by The American Academy of Arts and Letters. All of which brought the artist an invitation to teach at Hunter College (1948-1953) and subsequently at the Parsons School of Design, where he is currently an instructor in life drawing.

Csoka is an active member of a number of art societies, among them the National Academy, having been elected an associate in 1945 (graphics class) and an Academician three years later. He has etched a number of commissioned plates for Collectors of American Art and the Society of American Graphic Artists. His work — both his prints and painting — has found its way into numerous private collections here and abroad and belongs in the permanent possession of several of our important museums.

Throughout his career, Csoka has been devoted to the art of drawing, but neither as an exercise nor as preliminary for painting — though, of course, certain drawings may have served the latter purpose. He makes drawings, apart from, and in between, his painting and printmaking, as a means of personal study and as a personal expression of his love of line and form. The fact that he is one of a handful of American draughtsmen whose work is being actively sought by an equally small body of discriminating collectors may be inspiring Csoka to produce even more drawings — but I doubt it. Knowing him as I do, I feel he would draw and paint even if he had to return to doing something other than art to live, as he did on his arrival here years ago. For Csoka, drawing is as important as painting. He makes no discrimination between those drawings which have been rapidly produced and those on which much more time has been spent. He constantly experiments with various media and a variety of paper surfaces — as witnessed by his sparkling pastel with its painter-like handling compared to the sensitive linear modeling of the classic head study done in red Conté.

Two recent innovations in Csoka technique deserve comment. In the first of these — represented by the reclining lionesses, and the single female nude beside the chair — the surface of the paper was dampened and the initial drawing made with firm, rhythmic strokes of brown Conté. The tone in each was made by use of the finger (in the nude) and by using a sable brush to produce the wash effect in the other drawing.

The second technique, and one which Stephen feels has almost unlimited potential, is related to the drawing in ink of the horse and rider. To prepare his drawing ground, Csoka covered the surface of a piece of heavy drawing paper (70-pound watercolor paper, (rough) with a thin film of wax, rubbed on from an ordinary wax candle. On this surface, the drawing was made with a brush, using a diluted (with water) India ink. Final accents of dense black were added with full-strength ink, and the pure whites—having been previously covered by the light-gray wash initially put down—were effected by cutting through the wax ground with a knife held in a scraping position to the original paper surface.

The landscape drawing is unusual, for topographic undulation seldom attracts contemporary draughtsmen, but Csoka, in succumbing to its rhythms, has proved how effective a motif of a such a vista can be.

The two figure drawings— one of a male model and the other of a female— were drawn on gray paper with brown Conté. These drawings, obviously made from short-held action poses of the models, exhibit the authority that can only come to an artist who has made hundreds of these drawings and, in the doing, has been actively his own most severe critic.

Csoka admitted to me quite frankly that he prefers not to think about the drawing at all, while he is in the process of working, but to concentrate on the abstract relationships of line and tone. Then, out of the many he has made, the few he exhibits and releases to his dealer can represent the best unselfconscious efforts he has achieved. The present group were selected in this fashion and with this intention.
